Mirza Nathan was a Mughal officer in the Bengal in the early seventeenth century. His memoirs reflect the condition of service when the imperial cult had reached its zenith under the emperor Jahangir. Cooperation with Rajputs, competition for prestige among officers, and high number of attempted suicides are all hallmarks of the conditions of service in this new order.

This paper studies how the early Mughal Empire operated on the basis of intense emotional relationships among the elites and the emperor. Strong passions such as love, loyalty, honor, anger, and despair are portrayed by Indo-Persian chroniclers as central to the events and decisions made by the emperor, his immediate family, his extended family, and further down by chief commanders and even low level soldiers. My paper will investigate how successful kingship required the proper addressing of these emotions, while failure of course implied the incorrect approach to the emotions of one’s allies and subjects.

The reign of the Mughal Emperor Akbar (1556-1605), particularly during its latter half, is seen as a period of “early modernity” in Indian history. This would of course imply that the middle decades of the century, from the reign of Akbar’s father Humayun, constitute a transitional period where the Mughal state necessarily evolved out of pre-early-modern (hence medieval) phase. This paper will study this transition from the perspective a soldier and memoirist who was in the imperial service from the 1540’s until his retirement in the 1580’s to see if traces of such a transition have survived in the perspectives of an actual eyewitness and participant.

This paper investigates the significance of the elephant as a symbol of sovereignty in early Mughal India. The use of the animal initially proved difficult and problematic until the reign of the emperor Akbar in the second half of the century. The Mughal use of the elephants will also be contrasted with similar practices in the sultanates of southern India.
